I moved out of a process because I'd run out of problems to solve.

For me, it's not always about the pay.

The process had four pillars.

All four were under me.

The role I moved into next was in risk management.

When I consider a company, something about it has to interest me.

I want to know what's going on there.

I need a problem that keeps nagging at me.

Something that makes me think: what's going on here, and how can I solve it?

I want it to challenge me enough that not knowing makes me feel guilty.

Enough that I have to learn, come back and try to solve it.

Practise tackling problems with Founder's Find.

Live cases and simulations, inside a year-long career membership.
Apply for Membership.